Religious Freedom

The Mennonites and the Amish are Anabaptists who have made their homes in the Lancaster and York region for over 200 years. Having split from the state church in Europe in 1693, many were persecuted for their beliefs in the teachings of Jesus and in adult baptism. They also preached a biblical literalism that was seen as a threat to the broader culture. Many who left their homelands in the 18th century found religious refuge in Lancaster County. The Anabaptist communities established here in 1790 have been growing steadily ever since.

Illustration of Anabaptists

"Anabaptists" literally means "re-baptizers." They believed that people should make their own confession of faith before being baptized and therefore refused baptism to infants. Other denominations of Anabaptists include the Amish, Brethren, Hutterites, and Mennonites.

Benjamin Henry Latrobe Early Susquehanna River Watercolor

In the days of the early settlers, the Susquehanna River was a vital link of culture and commerce for the young nation. In 1781, Benjamin Henry Latrobe, later to become architect of the United States Capitol, sketched the river here and documented numerous improvements. Native Americans

Long before the Europeans arrived, the region was home to the Susquehanna Indians. From approximately 1700 A.D. to 1750 A.D., they lived on the banks of the Susquehanna River where they fished the waters and farmed the fertile soil. A few reports later, which arrived in 1750 in the southern end of the Susquehanna River in Maryland, he encountered the Susquehanna Indians who, around 1750, had replaced the Susquehanna Indians.

The Susquehanna Indians lived in villages along the river just north of Turkey Hill. They would move on a river about every 10 years as the riverbanks became sparsely around the old village. Their largest village on Washington River was situated in the 1750s in the 1750s.

By the 1750s, the Native Americans were rapidly being replaced with the European settlers. Most of these populations were eventually decimated by European diseases and other European diseases. The last Susquehanna village, dating to the 1750s, were just across the river from Turkey Hill in York County.

The Conestoga Indians

By the 1740s, the few remaining Susquehanna Indians were being forced to leave Lancaster County at the Conestoga Indian town, just a few miles from Turkey Hill. Along with members of other tribes, they became known as the Conestoga Indians. The Native Americans living in this town were on a common quest of peace, unity between the old world of the native tribes and the rapidly changing world of Colonial America. In 1763, Conestoga became a place of refuge and a stable history.

Paxtang Boys Murders

The Paxtang Boys had been in the Susquehanna River during the war. When caught, they were taken to the Conestoga Indian town. The Paxtang Boys had been in the Susquehanna River during the war. THE Underground Railroad

The Underground Railroad was an informal network of Americans who helped slaves escape to freedom. As these fugitives traveled north, they passed through "stations" in Lancaster and York Counties. The towns of Columbia and Wrightsville became a stopping-off site on the Underground Railroad, because of their proximity to the river. Slaves from the south were transported across the Susquehanna River and often fed and given supplies on their journey north. As many as 50,000 to 100,000 men, women and children escaped to freedom using the Underground Railroad.

William Whipper of Columbia helped slaves escape by hiding them in freight car compartments during the Civil War. His idea enabled fugitives to flee to safety faster than they would on foot. We can credit Whipper along with many other good citizens of Columbia and Wrightsville for helping slaves on their journey to freedom.

The Civil War

At the time of the Civil War, many Pennsylvanians were anti-slavery and pro-Union. As Confederate troops moved north into Pennsylvania, they recognized the strategic importance of the well-developed transportation routes in the region.

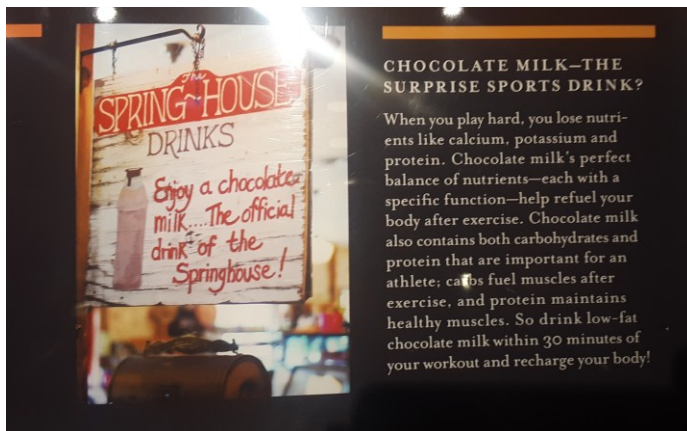

On June 28, 1863, in the midst of the Civil War, Confederate troops attempted to cross the bridge from Wrightsville to get to Lancaster and then Philadelphia. To prevent the advance of the troops, Mayor Granville O. Heller and Colonel Jacob G. Frick ordered the Union militia to set fire to the bridge. The fire completely burned the bridge in six hours.

Because the Confederate troops could not cross the bridge and carry on eastward, they ended up in the small town of Gettysburg, where a historic battle took place between the North and the South.
